Unbroken

Kayla Montgomery is a long-distance runner. Similar to other runners, she has smashed records and earned national recognition. But Kayla is different than most runners. She is living with an incurable disease called multiple sclerosis, or MS.

The disease damages the nerves, preventing the brain from signaling some parts of the body. When Kayla was diagnosed at age 14, she lost feeling in her legs for months. Her doctors told her to quit contact sports. As Kayla’s legs improved, she resolved to run instead.

During a race, Kayla deals with problems most runners never face. Most runners use their legs to set a pace. But Kayla’s body heat triggers MS symptoms, causing her legs to go numb. Kayla can’t feel how fast her legs are going. So, she compensates by using her arms.

At the end of a race, Kayla faces another problem. Since she loses feeling in her legs, when she stops running, she collapses. Therefore, her coach waits near the finish line to catch her and help her cool down.

Like any athlete, Kayla loves to win. But her happiness is always mingled with pain. For Kayla, that’s a small price to pay. Her ability to run is a gift she refuses to waste.
