Students from Hampton Elementary School recently visited the Ruth Patrick Science Center on the campus of the University of South Carolina - Aiken where they participated in activities that are designed to support and strengthen their understanding of concepts in math and science.

The 6th grade students participated in three academic programs. In the Animal Adaptations program, students learned about animal structures and behavioral responses that help animals survive. Students then participated in a program called, Hiker, where they used interactive computer programs to explore graphing concepts that track students' movements. Their third program they participated in was a planetarium program about the International Space Station held in the Dupont Planetarium; which is part of the Ruth Patrick Science Center facility.

Fifth grade had the chance to visit the planetarium to learn all about cells. Students also learned about Ravenous Raptors and had to put their
