Dual Immersion – Parent Meeting

Growth Mindset for Parents – Part 7

Developing important Psychosocial Skills

- A child's innate ability contributes to only about 25% of achievement. The other 75% are psychosocial skills that must be deliberately developed.
- The important skills we can help our children develop include:
 - Perseverance
 - Self-confidence
 - Resiliency
 - Coping skills for disappointment and failure
 - The ability to handle constructive feedback
- Choose books to read with younger students that highlight characters that demonstrate these skills. Discuss these with your child.
- When watching TV or a movie with your kids, talk about a character's strength or lack of perseverance or resiliency. Ask your children how the situation or story would be different if the person did or did not have this skill.
- Name the psychosocial skills words and use phrases that represent these around the house. For example, "My supervisor gave me some constructive feedback about how I can do my job better. I am grateful for that because she gave me new things to try" or "I was watching you (XXXXX) today. You really showed determination and perseverance!"
